the capmakers have nothing to do. Seventy-five of these green operatives are now at work. The house claims to have taken back all the old hands and additional ones besides. Mr. Marks admits that there are numbers of capmakers now going about out of employment. The strike did a good deal to destroy the business of this season. He stated that thirty-four of the capmakers are at present out of employment and considers their by-laws bad, although his house agreed to and has kept them.

Do the thousands who live in fine houses, who dress elegantly, who ride in carriages to balls, theatres and the opera, who give sumptuous dinners and who are happy, really remember the poor? Do they picture to themselves not only those who lack all of these things, but those who are dying in the nether depths? dent of the Elevated Railroad Company, who died suddenly on Sunday at the Windsor Hotel, Forty-sixth street and Fifth avenue. Mr. Barney went to Albany forty last week to look after some business connected with the railroad. He returned to his hotel on Friday last and complained of having taken cold, but did not think it serious enough to call in medical assistance. the celebrated couplet:—
Let laws and learning arts and commerce die,
I'll leave ye still our old manors.

Mr. Disraeli seems to forget that the Post Office, which is combined the government telegraph and the postal service, is the most important branch of the State, and should be governed by a man possessing, not merely business qualifications, but a high moral character, in which Lord John Manners is lamentably deficient.

Finally, Sir Stafford Northcote, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, is the least able to cope with far greater difficulties than are likely to beset his path at present. Indeed, after Mr. Gladstone, he is supposed to be the best financial minister whom England boasts, and his high position and means being based on that of his great predecessor, to whom he was private secretary many years, it is not surprising that he should not recognize a sketch of the new Chancellor as "Sir Warwick Westland." Sir Stafford, who was one of the ablest financiers in America, and everywhere esteemed as an intelligent, courteous gentleman.

Regarding minor appointments, Mr. W. H. Smith ("Newspaper Smith"), proprietor of all the railway newspapers, and a man of high character and ability, is to be made an excellent man of business, becomes Financial Secretary to the Treasury.

men organize in self-defence. The workmen are resentful about their plans or demands, but look confident of triumph. They have the appearance of men who, stung by acts which they consider injustice, have determined to resist.

THE CAPMAKERS' STRIKE.

Mr. Marks, of the firm of Marks Brother & Thompson, capmakers, Greene street, stated yesterday to THE Herald reporter that the rumor about the new strike is untrue. He says that their firm did not order the last week for 100 new hands, but alleged that they are intended for hat work, with which the capmakers have nothing to do. Seventy-five of these green operatives are now at work. The house claims to have taken back all the old hands and additional ones besides. Mr. Marks admits that there are numbers of capmakers now going to the present out of employment and that a good deal to destroy the business of this season. He thinks that three-quarters of the capmakers are at present out of employment and considers their bylaws bad, although his house agreed to and has kept them.
